Management's Voice

- Management said it remains on track to reach 3,000 stores by March, while longer-term growth will come from assortment expansion, geographic expansion, and deeper penetration in existing cities.
- Blinkit said it is on track to reach 3,000 stores by March, but it would not give a specific store-count guide beyond that. Management said growth will not map neatly to store additions because some markets are still in build-out mode while others need different supply formats to expand assortment.
- Management is confident in reaching 5–6% margins (Quick commerce) through consistent execution — no major strategic shift needed, just staying the course.
- The Management said it prefers to reinvest incremental margin into growth if it can earn a good return.
- About Bistro business it is small experiment it has no plan to expand into travel through district
 - On capex, it said automation will continue to rise over time, but only where the returns are visible and the ROCE case is clear.
- The Management said MTU growth remains strong because it is still spending on marketing for new customer acquisition. Management added that rivals have pulled back, which has lowered customer acquisition costs and made it worthwhile to keep marketing spend high for now.

Key Risk

- This is a very tough, highly competitive market with many big players like Swiggy, Zepto, and Amazon. Because they all have plenty of money, advanced technology, and strong delivery networks, it is very hard to compete against them.
- It is quite difficult for new companies to enter this market. Success requires not only a strong network of dark stores and delivery systems but also long-term efforts to build good relationships with vendors and gain the trust of customers.
- Customers can easily switch between platforms because they are motivated by discounts, loyalty programs, and fast delivery, which gives them significant bargaining power. Additionally, competition from local vendors and modern retail stores like DMart puts further pressure on these companies.

Decomposing the ROE & ROA for Eternal LTD

The company is utilizing its assets efficiently and has taken on some leverage—but margins dropped so significantly that ROE (Return on Equity) failed to improve.

ROA declined from 1.48% to 0.90% as net profit margin deterioration (-74%) significantly outweighed asset turnover improvement (+133%) — indicating company is efficiently utilizing assets to generate sales but unable to convert those sales into profits due to high cost structure in expansion phase.
